The Study of Adolescents (SOAD) is a global, multidisciplinary project that investigates a variety of issues in adolescents, including health and the determinants of health. [unreadable] [unreadable] SOAD's work is designed to address the paucity of data about the health, health behaviors, and health related problems among adolescents. SOAD's five-year International Research Development (R21) Phase, which is the focus of the current renewal, will build upon the two previous cycles of R21 funding that provided preliminary data on global, national, and regional variations in health and health-related problems in adolescents. The SOAD R21 will continue to: (1) identify common themes and patterns across countries in the determinants of health and health-related problems; (2) identify and develop appropriate methods to address the burden of disease and the determinants of health among adolescents; and (3) identify the ethical, legal and social implications (ELSI) of implementing and evaluating such research. For example, the ELSI of assuring culturally appropriate adolescent participation in the research, assuring that adolescents are not harmed as a result of participation, and assuring that any research benefits are shared, will be addressed. [unreadable] [unreadable] This international research proposal builds on SOAD's previous work to address the health and health-related problems of adolescents. But not everyone is buying it. For years, Piers Morgan has been pounding away at the wall of Britain’s closed, and often intolerant, society. His TV shows, column in the Daily Mail and articles in The Sun exposed the inadequacies of Britain’s press and media to cover in any depth the problems of Muslim communities. The media’s ‘fear of
